The Ebola virus can remain in semen for longer than previously thought, suggesting men who survive the disease should always use a condom during sex.

Health officials thought the Ebola virus could remain in semen for about three months, but a recent case in West Africa suggests infection through sex can happen more than five months later, the CBS News reported.

It was recently reported that a 44-year-old Liberian woman, whose infection likely came from a 46-year-old man who had Ebola symptoms September 2014, fell ill in March, a week after sex with him, and died, but another woman he had sex with around the same time tested negative.

CDC spokeswoman Kristen Nordlund said that there have been fewer than 10 such cases and it's been difficult to pinpoint that sex was the only way they may have been infected. (ANI)

The experts said the Ebola scare was over.
But 60 days ago, in a Liberian ghetto called Red Light, a gangster was killed.
The virus was in his blood.

When the drug companies need the money and they get paid for approval for a vaccine, we will see Ebola back in the news, and fear will make them money.
